International Economic & Financial Law (3 NTU short-term program credits)

This program consists of four sections: WTO Law, Financial Derivatives and Investment, Banking Law and FinTech Regulation, and Exploring Law and Practice in Taiwan. Students will study intensively for 4-6 hours per day to complete these 4 sections throughout the 3-Week program.

*Upon successful completion of the program, participants will receive an academic transcript with 3 NTU short-term program credits. If they wish to have their credits approved, they should consult their home institutions and credit advisors in advance.

Banking Law and FinTech Regulation (1 NTU short-term program credit)

This course will introduce the banking theories behind banking regulations and apply these theories to understand why banks need regulation and the regulatory development after the Global Financial Crisis. This course will also apply the banking theories to understand whether and how to regulate emerging FinTech activities, practically the crypto-asset-related businesses.

Dr. Yueh-Ping (Alex) Yang is currently an Associate Professor at the College of Law, National Taiwan University. Dr. Yang received his S.J.D. from Harvard Law School.

Dr. Yang's research areas include financial regulation, FinTech, corporate governance, law and economics, and international economic laws and has publications in Taiwan and the United States.

Financial Derivatives and Investment (1 NTU short-term program credit)

This course will focus on finance through the capital market and general principles of capital market regulations. The course will also consider challenges and legal issues that may arise when applying new technology to capital market activities.

Dr Christopher Chao-hung Chen is currently Associate Professor at the College of Law, National Taiwan University. Dr Chen received his PhD from University of London (UCL). Before 2021, Dr Chen was Associate Professor of Law at the Singapore Management University. Dr Chen specializes in corporate law, financial law and regulations, and empirical legal studies, and has publications in Taiwan, the US, UK, and Singapore.

WTO Law/International Economic and Trade Law (1 NTU short-term program credit)

This course will focus on the nexus between international trade and non-trade regulations and policy concerns, which reflects the post-covid development of international trade law. Particular concerns would be paid to climate change, inclusive trade, etc. This course also considers new models of global governance over economic affairs.

Dr. Ching-wen Hsueh is currently an Associate Professor at the Department of International Business at National Chengchi University. Dr. Hsueh received her Dr.iur. (Doktor der Rechte) from the University of Cologne, Germany. She was an Assistant Professor at the College of Law at National Chiaotung University, Taiwan.
